New Residents Asked to Check State Tax Laws

Many thousands of the newcomers who moved to California during 1959 will be required to file California income tax returns, State Controller Alan Cranston, Chairman of the Franchise Tax Board, said yesterday.

"Persons moving to California are generally considered residents of this State when they arrive," he said. "Subsequently, their entire income after their arrival is taxable even though it may be derived in part from another state."

However, members of the armed forces who move to this State under military orders do not become residents by reason of their transfer here.

Returns for 1959 must be filed by single individuals whose net income was $1,500 or more and by married couples whose combined net income was $3,000 or more.

"Some newcomers to California may be uncertain of their resident status for income tax purposes," Cranston said. "In that case, they should call at the local office or write to headquarters office of the Franchise Tax Board, 1025 P St., Sacramento 14, for assistance."
